I'm going to report on a case study of a programme which has been set up to help rural _____ in Mozambique, a largely agricultural country in South-East Africa.

The programme worked with three communities in Chicualacuala district, near the Limpopo River. This is a dry and arid region, with _____ rainfall. Because of this, people in the area were _____ to support themselves through agriculture and instead they used the forest as a means of providing themselves with an income, mainly by selling charcoal. However, this was not a sustainable way of living in the long term, as they were rapidly using up this resource.

To support agriculture in this dry region, the programme focused primarily on making use of existing water resources from the Limpopo River by setting up systems of _____, which would provide a dependable water supply for crops and animals. The programme worked closely with the district _____ in order to find the best way of implementing this. The region already had one _____' association, and it was decided to set up two more of these. These associations planned and carried out activities including water _____, livestock breeding and agriculture, and it was notable that in general, women formed the majority of the workforce.
